// Director Statement //

“Ultimately the bond of all companionship... is conversation.” – Oscar Wilde

Size Queen is a short film about Chris, a creative navigating the pressure to follow a conventional path, and the choice to pursue something of his own.

While the film centers on that turning point, it also introduces the larger world: four friends, each with distinct perspectives on love, sex, relationships, and ambition. The podcast we see at the end isn't the story yet—it's the beginning of it. It becomes the space where these conversations unfold, episode by episode, with humor, contradiction, and emotional honesty.

I was interested in capturing this moment before everything opens up, the tension between expectation and instinct, and what it takes to choose yourself when it's not the obvious path. As a queer filmmaker, I'm drawn to stories that reflect our lives beyond identity as conflict: people building careers, friendships, and relationships in ways that feel both specific and universal.

At its core, Size Queen is about that first step and the community that forms around it. The film stands on its own, while setting the tone and voice for a larger series grounded in friendship, perspective, and the messiness of modern life.

// About the Filmmaker //

Kenny Fierro is a Los Angeles–based writer, director, and producer focused on character-driven stories about intimacy, identity, and modern relationships. Originally from Long Island, his work is rooted in observation—finding humor and tension in the way people connect, communicate, and come into themselves.

He holds a degree in Business Administration with a specialization in Marketing from Stony Brook University and has worked alongside global brands including Apple and Google. His creative training includes acting studies at Baron Brown Studio and writing development at Writing Pad in Los Angeles.

Size Queen, adapted from his original pilot, marks his directorial debut and reflects his interest in ensemble storytelling and grounded, contemporary narratives.
